One, two, three, five, ten, thirty-three...

In the beginning, there's white amid the black; then comes red, followed by blue. Lastly, yellow appears. This is a simple story of colours which seems to be drawn from a picture by Piet Mondrian.

Yes, that's true, but there's more to it.

Meanwhile, ours isn't exactly a picture... maybe we could call it a three dimensional fresco, recounted by two actors of few, indeed very few words.

Without talking they talk about sky and sea, about things of life and the marvel of being surprised by the flight of a bird, by a darting fish, by a rolling ball.

And to say that it all begins with a guy who peels an apple and in the end realises that the moon is a light bulb...
